The commission made no recommendation as to the United States assuming mandate over Turkey and Armenia but the report contained extensive arguments for and against such action. The principal arguments in favor of accepting the mandate were that the influence of the United States would tend to avert wars, that the inhabitants wanted American protection and that this would give the United States opportunity to do a great humanitarian work. The reasons advanced against the mandate was that it would weaken the Monroe doctrine, that "humanitarianism begins at home" and that the first year's cost would be $275,000,000.
